"impermanence" & "resistance" are the two key word that qualify Axel MOREL's work.

Axel MOREL, a French-born European artist, explores the boundaries between sculpture and volume embroidery, developing a singular artistic approach that fuses tradition and innovation.

A graduate of the Métiers d'Art, he began his career as a costume designer at the Opéra Bastille in Paris, while continuing to explore sculpture in all its forms. He also trained in gold embroidery, adding to his technical repertoire.

In his work, Axel MOREL transcends conventional sculptural techniques by integrating embroidery into three-dimensional structures, whether figurative or abstract. This innovative approach gives rise to pieces in which the thread, traditionally associated with the surface, extends and rises, creating singular and moving organic and dynamic forms. Beads, glass tubes, silk or gold threads, sequins, linen, but also plastics, rubber, aluminum, ceramics or lurex, all materials are called upon!

VESTIGES

In June 2024, he was given a carte blanche by the Culturama festival in Sofia, Bulgaria, on the theme of water.

He created a sort of cabinet of curiosities, where "sea bones" can be observed under globes, a sort of imaginary coral relics, subtle sculptures made of cellulose, glass tube beads and lurex. They are accompanied by embroidered octopus and photo-macros.

It's like an ocean relic. an empty shell, a bone that could be that of an aquatic animal on which a coral has lived and disappeared.

SCULPTURES

PHOTOS

Making the "sea bones" required the use of jeweller's glasses to get as close as possible to the sculptures and combine the materials with precision.

This close-up vision changed the meaning of the work and revealed surprising landscapes!

I decided to show these macroscopic visions as a counterpoint to the sculptures, using photographs taken during the design phase, so as to share these fantastic landscapes with observers.

BRODERIES

I use a variety of embroidery techniques, always leaving plenty of room for improvisation.

In this dialogue with the object and the material(s), I value the "accident", the unpredictable, the uncontrolled that makes the object unique and non-reproducible.

Embroidering "vanities" is a bit like conjugating infinity and impermanence. The object remains and reminds us, living but mortal, that nothing lasts, that everything passes away.

It's up to us to define what to make of this passage: a fear or an opportunity.

It was the challenge of moving away from flat to create volumes that led me to start the "octopus" series.

COSTUMES

Creating stage costumes has always been a game for me!

It's a game of assembly that begins by translating an intention, a thought, an act into an object that tells a story, that shows, that offers itself to the gaze of others.

Whether in a public or private space, or on stage, the costume gives the wearer the energy and force of his or her message.

It's probably no coincidence that I started sewing drag show costumes in 1990!

My speciality in corsetry has guided my approach, which is centred on the constrained body that gives the line, sculpts the body and forces it to adapt and unfold in this new envelope.

4 HANDS / MIRROR

Charmed by the works of artists whose work I love, I create mirrored embroideries with their permission. It's a kind of artistic "four hands" combining homage and technical challenges.
